The more the playwright knows about the conditions under which his play is to be produced the better. The depth of the theatre and of the star are both factors of importance, and it can't do the author a bit of harm to know the width of the stage and the leading lady before he so much as begins his manuscript. Certainly one would not write the same gort of a play for the Century and the Little Theatre, nor for Marie Dressler and Marguerite Clark. There is not a bit of use in conceiving a character and then finding that there is no one in New York who can play the part. The trouble with the bad plays which come to town is not that they fit the players too snugly, but that they were never meant to wear at all. COWBOYS' GUNS

Speaking of Lucille Watson, in reviewing "His Bridal Night," we used the infelicitous phrase, "a deserter from the scarlet army of the stage."

The review was called to the attention of Miss Watson, and she writes: "When you say things like this about defenceless performers you might endeavor to be a little less ambiguous. I have played one 'scarlet' part in my entire career, and those people who did not see me do it and who read those not see me do it and who read those few lines of yours, will naturally wonder from what ranks of scarlet actresses I am a deserter."
